PICTURE PERFECT

Model Joan Smalls braved the cold—and rush-hour traffic—during our NYC cover shoot.

The outcome of every big photo shoot depends on a long list of variables: Is the weather cooperating? Is the team on time? How's the catering? But on this sunny, albeit chilly, spring day the stars aligned. This month's cover shoot in New York City's West Village went off without a hitch. Taking advantage of the neighborhood, the team captured supermodel Joan Smalls wearing the season's relaxed, athletic-inspired pieces in one charming downtown setting after another. See the results on page 86.

EYE OF THE BEHOLDER

I RECENTLY DISCOVERED THAT CHRISTIE BRINKLEY FOLLOWS me on Instagram. I promise this is not a humblebrag and I am going somewhere with this. Bear with me. When I was growing up in the '80s, Christie and a cohort of blondes like Claudia Schiffer were the definition of beauty to me. Probably (subconsciously) because they were my polar opposite. I was neither blond (most of my adolescence I had stringy Snape-like hair) nor tall ("runt" would be a generous word. I finally had my growth spurt sometime during freshman year of college. I suspect the fact that a Taco Bell opened in my dorm probably had something to do with that). And I was not curvaceous (and still am not, alas).

This photo was taken in one of my favorite spots in NYC—TenOverTen nail salon in Soho. Sweater, $495, toryburch.com. Culottes, $90, topshop.com. Eva's own jewelry.

But growing up, I was relatively content with my physical lot in life, never really comparing myself to others and certainly not to celebrities, models or the ilk. They felt as removed from my day-to-day as life-forms in a galaxy far, far away. Today, though, we live in a different age, a post-Instagram, post-Kardashian time when images and standards of beauty are everywhere, and passing judgment is as swift as a heart button or a tip-tap on the screen. The interwebs can feel like a minefield for women, full of trolls and haters. I wonder if I would have the same pretty blasé attitude about my appearance if I had come through my teen years in this hyper-connected world.

The positive side of social media, of course, is that we can connect the dots of people, places, ideas and movements. I use it to scout for undiscovered designers, fresh writers, new photographers and bloggers to spotlight.

It was through Instagram that I became enamored of one Miss Joan Smalls. Joan is—there's no other way to put it—ridiculously good-looking. I rarely use the word "fierce" to describe people (I just can't go there), but it's an apt word for the model, who is a study in contrasts: leonine and lanky, tomboy yet purely feminine. There's a strength to her beauty, a steeliness. She's a girl you know would have your back. I'd met her a few times at various parties and was intimidated by her cool gaze. But on Instagram, I saw another side of her: goofy, self-deprecating, celebratory of her Puerto Rican roots. Our shoot with her (very much inspired by her impeccable off-duty style) and Jenna Gottlieb's piece highlight those aspects, the very best among many excellent traits.

I hope you'll love the rest of the issue too, dear readers, and take from it whatever you need at this very moment—that might be our fashion and personal style features on topics from the best and brightest accessories of the season to, on the opposite end of the spectrum, how to master the minimalist look. It might be a little levity in the form of Lauren Sherman's most excellent essay on wearing the same dress to (gasp!) 10 weddings. Or it might be the musings of senior associate beauty editor Megan O'Neill, whose personal and candid piece should be a wake-up call for every woman (no matter what skin color) to get checked for skin cancer. You'll continued...

also undoubtedly be inspired by Raf Stahelin's ode-to-spring shoot with actress Olga Kurylenko, who, while looking like the picture of pretty, cops to purposely avoiding glamorous roles. She, like Joan, proves that as the extremely wise Zoolander once said, there's more to life than being ridiculously good-looking.

STYLE Q&A

Resident know-it-all Jean Godfrey-June answers your pressing fashion and beauty questions.

Champion thigh-high wearer Soo Joo Park demonstrates the ideal not-pulled-too-high length in Paris.

Q I'm falling in love with all the thigh-high socks on Instagram. What's the appropriate amount of skin to show and how do I make them stay up? —Kelly F.

A Dear Kelly, Even model Soo Joo Park (left) had qualms initially. "When I was in high school, American Apparel was all the rage, and I saw girls in their knitted thigh-high socks and granny glasses and thought, That's so cool!" says Soo Joo. "Still, I hesitated to wear them the first couple of months."

The fear, mentioned by Soo Joo and Lucky editors, is looking like Julia Roberts' character in Pretty Woman. "I think of it as a slightly long kneesock, really, rather than a thigh-high," says creative director Katia Kuethe. "The proportion is key. And the texture is relevant—nothing shiny or lacy. Ribbed is great. You either want innocent and cute or sturdy and librarian-like."

Lucky senior associate beauty editor Megan O'Neill has given up tights entirely in favor of thigh-highs. "Tights add bulk, and it's another annoying thing around your waist," she says. "Don't pull them to the thickest part of your thigh, though. Even if you're the skinniest person, it's not flattering. If they're too high, they pinch. If they're too low, they fall down. You have to experiment."

Finding the pair perfect for your proportions also involves experimentation: They're often packaged like tights in stores, so you can't try them on. We've had the best luck with the aforementioned American Apparel and with Wolford.

Once you have the right pair, they improve practically any outfit, says Soo Joo: "I like a hint of thigh-highs under a longer skirt or a skirt with a high slit. It leaves room for imagination!"

Soo Joo gave us even more amazing tips! For all of them plus pictures of her favorite looks, visit luckyshops.com/soojoo.

Model Alla Goncharova's clear, soft, glowy skin backstage at Novis.

Q What's the quickest way to get rid of a breakout? What's the absolute minimum amount of time for a spot to stick around? —Lauren

A Dear Lauren, Two days is your minimum. There are lotions that make every sort of claim, but really, 48 hours is it.*

You can achieve that minimum only by absolutely not touching it even once and by treating the breakout with benzoyl peroxide, says New York/Miami dermatologist Dr. Fredric Brandt. An over-the-counter formula is usually fine. Blue light therapy, in the office or from a company like IlluMask ($30, illumask.com), can further reduce redness and bacteria. My personal formula is Glytone Acne 3P Gel ($30, dermstore.com) in the morning and Fresh Umbrian Clay Mattifying Mask ($49, fresh.com) as a spot treatment left on all night. The Umbrian Clay has the added benefit of keeping you from touching the spot, which, I must repeat here, is as crucial as the treatment!

Unless you've got the budget and time for an injection from a dermatologist, which will cut your time down to one day.*

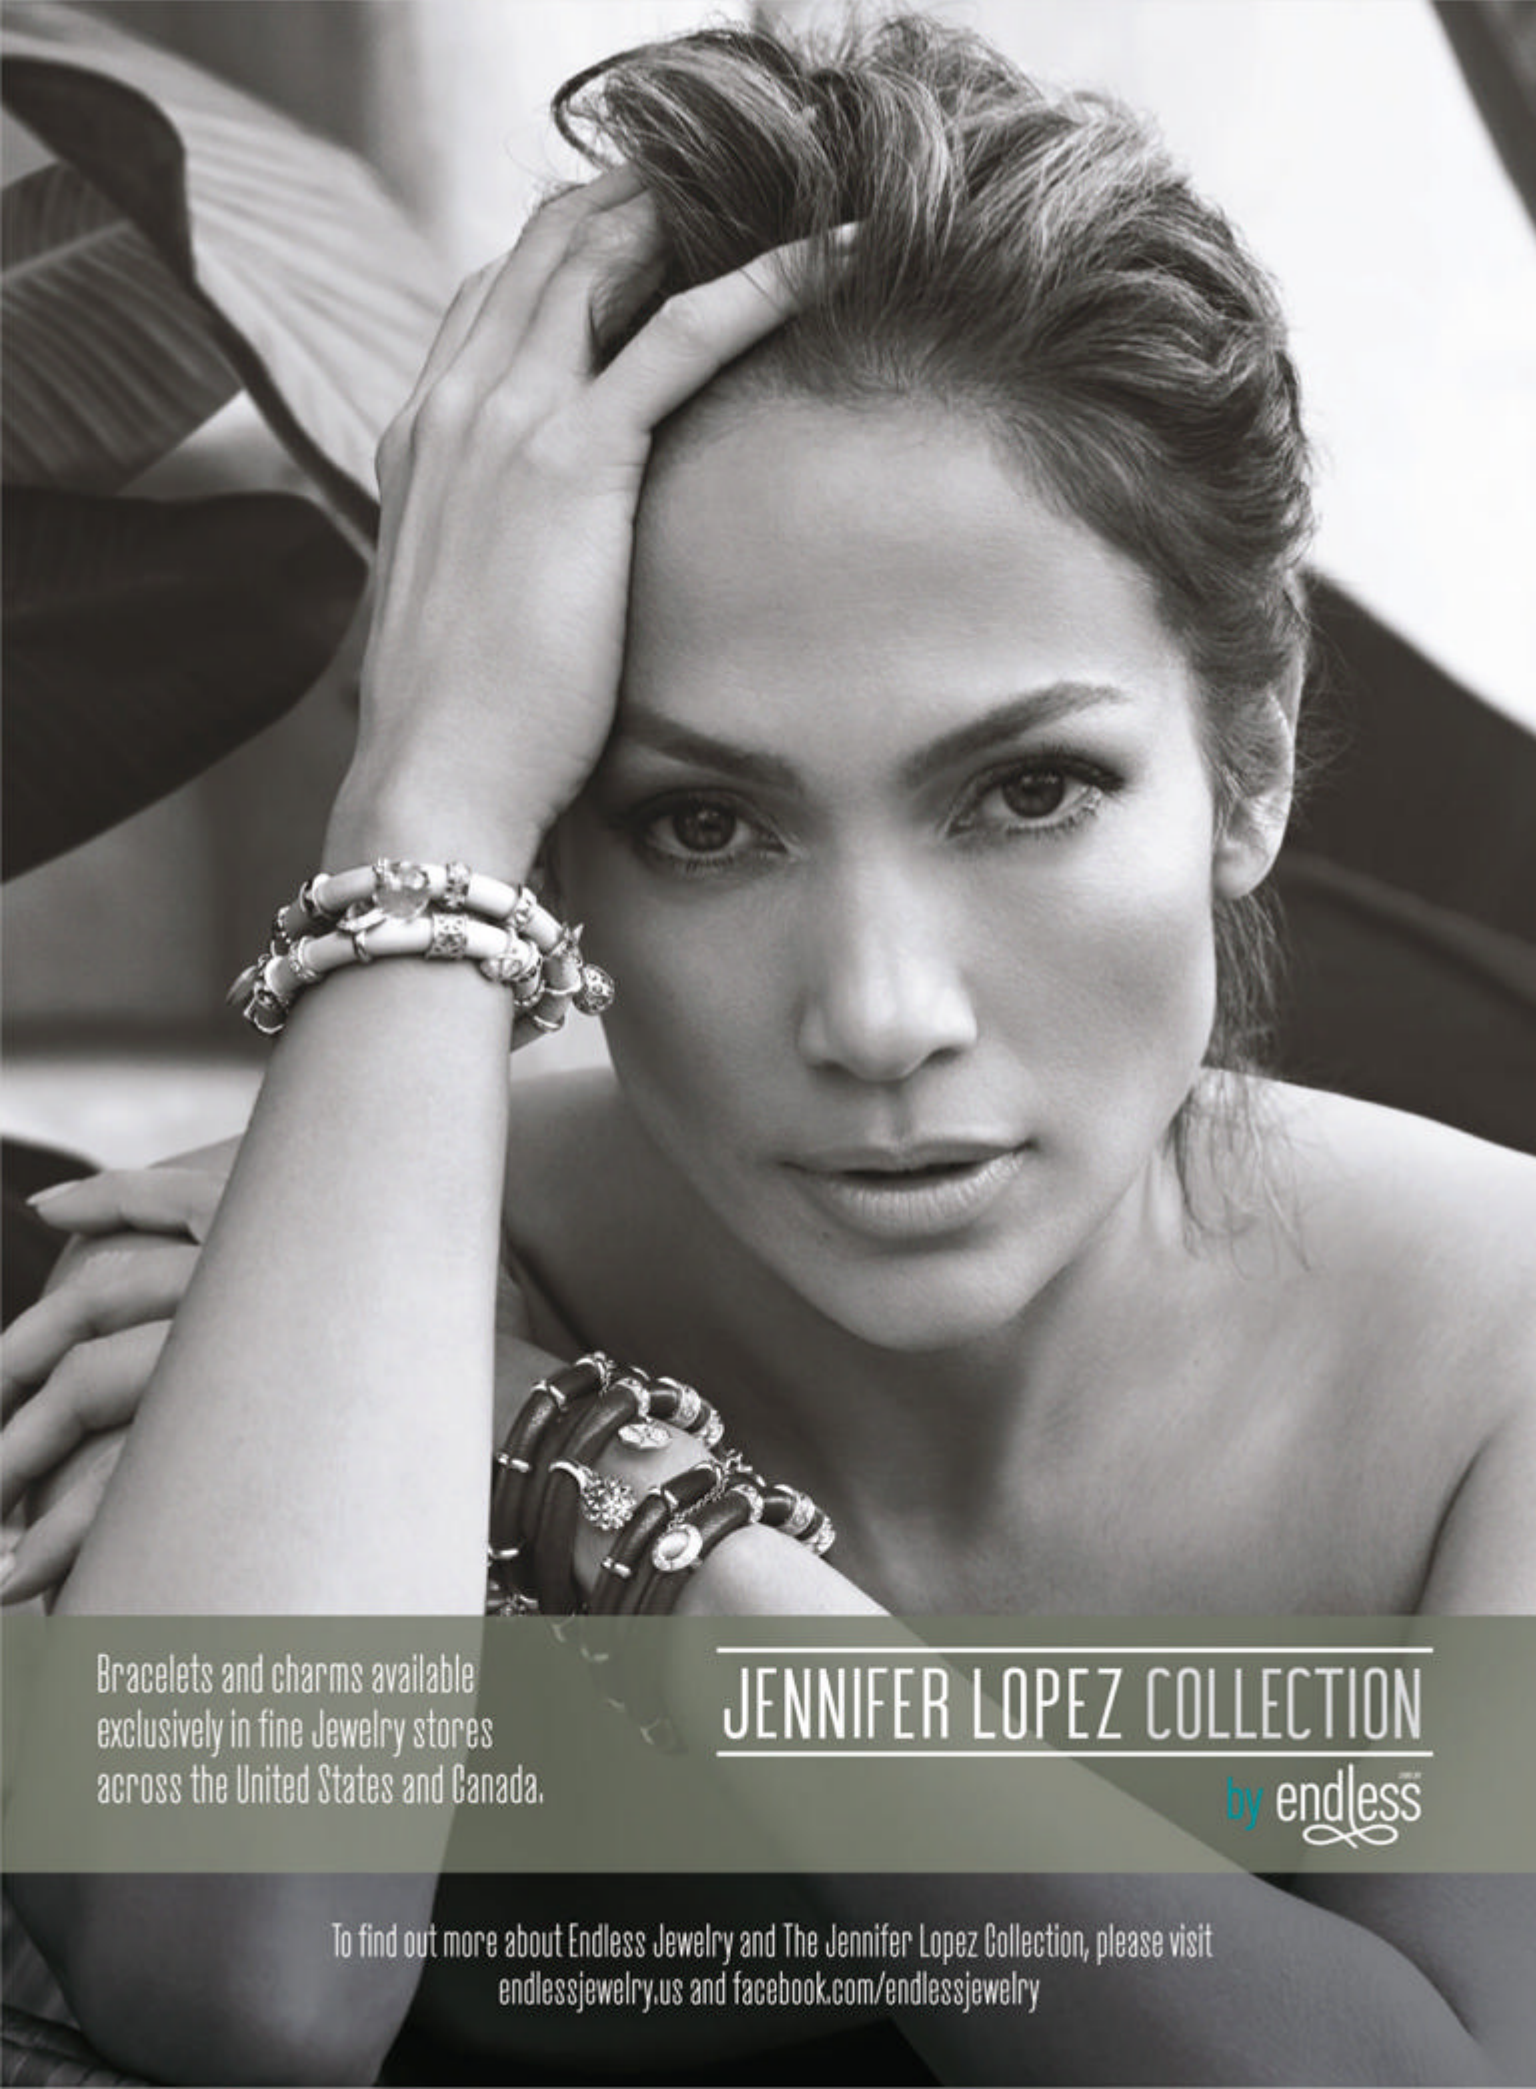

Q What should I choose for my Office Cardigan for the summer—you know, the piece you keep at work for when the AC is too much? Is it more about a jacket this season? A sweater? —Aida

A Dear Aida, You're right to be strategic about your choice of AC defense (why the world's corporations must err so egregiously on the side of global warming I cannot fathom). Since it goes on top, it needs to look especially fantastic. Lucky fashion director Anne Keane likes a taupe cardigan. "A jacket is not going to go with everything the way you need it to," she says. "And it needs a place to hang. You can fold a thin taupe sweater nicely until the next time. It's chicer and more interesting than black, and it lets your outfit still be the star." Chianti & Parker, Crippen, Equipment and M. Patmos all have pretty ones this year. Note: Editors often keep a shawl or two folded away for variety, Anne says, "just to have another cozy, stylish option around."

You want this pulled-together feeling, while also staying toasty-warm in your arctic office.

NEW THINGS TO TRY, WEAR AND LOVE!

Photographer and blogger Hanneli Mustaparta in an eye-popping coat.

MARKO MACPHERSON

GARDEN PARTY

This season delivers a fresh bouquet of bright, oversize florals on crisp, structured silhouettes.

FOR SPRING, DESIGNERS NOT ONLY embraced all things in bloom—they gave the traditionally feminine pattern a modern twist. Big, bold and often worn completely head to toe, these larger-than-life prints added a riotously colorful flourish to the runways. But scale and vibrancy weren't the only factors breathing new life into the motif. In terms of shape, things took a turn for the architectural. Rather continued...

than the flowing maxi dresses and ethereal tops often associated with the design, the looks went in a more cutting-edge direction. There were boxy capes in abstract watercolors at Chanel, slim suits in bubblegum pinks at Victoria Beckham and sleek, tropical-inspired crop tops and pencil skirts at Kate Spade.

"People are seeking an antidote to minimalism," says designer Karen Walker. Her most recent collection included graphic, vine-covered trousers and overcoats in rust and navy, as well as wide-legged culottes in subtler—but no less striking—wallpaper prints filled with shades of peach and amethyst. "There's no better way to celebrate the arrival of spring," she says. "Florals can look great when they're audacious."

AMANDA KEISER

Is taking cues from tastemakers both cutting-edge and classic.

"When it comes to fashion, my motto is 'Never say never,'" declares Lucky digital style director Amanda Keiser. "Culottes were definitely on my 'nope' list at first, but now I wear them all the time." Keiser also gravitates toward pieces that straddle the line between vintage and modern, and her style icons reflect that dichotomy. "I love Grace Kelly and Gwen Stefani," she says. "They both completely embody their respective looks."

SAY "YES" TO THE DRESS

Ten weddings. One dress. Writer Lauren Sherman puts her wardrobe remix skills to the test.

I LIKE WEDDINGS. I CONSIDER IT A PRIVILEGE TO WITNESS two people making a serious, life-affirming commitment. I'd say that nine times out of 10, my husband and I have a great time.

Last year, I got the opportunity to test my "nine times out of 10" wedding enjoyment theory; we were invited to 11 and quickly committed to 10. We had few complaints—we just planned our year around all of them, forgoing vacations and skipping summer weekends away.

But what was I going to wear?

Sure, I had things in my closet that could work for certain occasions, but what about that Edinburgh-in-the-winter ceremony? Or the Pittsburgh July 4th weekend scorcher? Or the casual D.C. art-gallery cocktail fete? Finding the right look for each event felt like a bit of a trial, even for me: a fashion writer who loves to shop.

The dress. A.k.a. the Tailor Bow Back Party Dress from Katie Ermilio's spring 2014 collection.

Things took an interesting turn when my friend Emme asked me to be her sole bridesmaid. Emme happens to have great taste (as in, I want to filch every single item in her closet), so I was excited to hear what she had in mind for my bridesmaid dress. "Pick something that you feel comfortable in," she e-mailed me. "Something you'll want to wear again."

It may sound like the canned comment that plenty of insincere brides tell their wedding party, but I believed Emme's aim was true. (Also, she's a terrible liar.) Her only real request was that the dress be pale pink, blue or white. Her e-mail included a link to photos of New York designer Katie Ermilio's latest collection, which featured several blush cocktail dresses. I already owned a perfect-fitting suit made by Katie, who comes from a long line of bespoke tailors, and had secretly always wanted to buy one of her more formal pieces. Now I had a reason.

Emme and I settled on a bow-back number with a subtle tulip skirt that hit right above the knee: ideal for flats, generally my wedding shoe of choice. It was perfect. We both loved it. But it was expensive. (Let's just say there's a comma in the price.) So it was imperative that I actually did wear it again. And again. And again.

Ten times, in fact, would make the price-per-wear palatable. This would not be my dress of the moment, but my look for the whole year. I got permission from Emme to break it out for the three weddings that preceded hers and started planning. All I needed were the accessories to make this beautiful pale pink canvas feel different for each event. Because there was no way I was going to let myself get bored.

It was easy in the beginning, since the dress was simple and classic. For Wedding Number 1, a black-tie fete in February, I added a Helmut Lang tuxedo blazer and finishing touches from my own 2011 wedding: a Kate Spade New York box clutch with a Lucite bow handle and a pair of Giambattista Valli kitten heels with a grosgrain bow covering the toe. (I decided not to buy any new accessories specifically for these events. It felt, in a way, unfaithful to my mission.)

Wedding Number 2, which took place in swampy Florida, called for my neon yellow Lulu Guinness lip clutch and silver Chloé ankle-strap flats. Just days later, my husband and I flew off to Wedding Number 3, in chilly Scotland, where I topped off the dress with an Acne mohair cardigan, a gold locket and black Theory flats. At Wedding Number 4, on the dreamy island of St. Barths—the most pressure-filled, because it was Emme's—I did my best to let the dress shine on its own and walked down the aisle in a pair of A.P.C. heels, although they were replaced by Bass sandals after the ceremony.

Four weddings in, I was just impressed that I had worn the thing multiple times without ruining it: no red wine splashes, no oil marks, no ink stains. (I did become quite friendly with my local dry cleaner, whose employees soon recognized the dress before they recognized me.)

Now that Emme's wedding was behind me, I relaxed a little. I stopped looking for particularly inventive ways to style the dress and instead focused on the fact that I still really loved it. And that other guests seemed to like it too. (The bow on the back was a hit.) It traveled with me to Delaware in late May for Wedding Number 5, my friend Claire's beautiful backyard ceremony, and to Chicago for Erica's art-gallery celebration (Wedding Number 6). My cousin's Fourth of July weekend extravaganza—Wedding Number 7—was a breeze. (Literally: Pittsburgh's typical midsummer humidity was replaced that day by a pleasant chill.) For those events, I recycled my previous looks, making what I actually wore—other than the dress, of course—sort of a blur.

It wasn't until Wedding Number 8—a casual cocktail party in a Washington, D.C., gallery, for which I accessorized with a vintage Levi's denim jacket—that I hit a wall. I still loved the dress, but I also had the urge to hide it in the back of my closet and forget about it for a little while. Wedding Number 9, my friend Hayley's big day at the Bowery Hotel in New York City, was coming up. The venue is so hip and specific that it could easily serve as a backdrop for Wes Anderson's next movie. The day of, I wanted nothing more than to throw on a navy slipdress and some slides and call it a day. (I imagined Hayley's other guests wearing things like that.) I craved a change.

But I was also determined not to give up. I tried hacking the system, asking Katie—the designer—whether she thought it would be okay for me to dye the dress black. That would make it more versatile in the future, right? "I wouldn't recommend it," she said in an expert voice that I knew was less about preserving her original vision and more about preserving the actual fabric.

Sherman and her husband at Wedding Number 6 in Chicago.

So I soldiered on, arriving at Hayley's in my standby, paired with Saint Laurent kitten heels and a Mansur Gavriel mini bucket bag in red. By Wedding Number 10, November's New Orleans bash, I was in the home stretch and actually excited to wear the dress for one final lap. Accessories-wise, I think I went with the kitten heels once again, and maybe my Cos circle bag? I don't even remember.

What I do remember is that after all those wears, the dress gave me a real feeling of satisfaction. I'm not one for fast fashion: I still own (and wear) pieces that I bought in 10th grade. But I've never been great at repeating—and creatively reworking—clothes, either. This fall, inspired by my wedding experiment, I did something I've struggled with in the past: I created boundaries around my purchases, buying only three or four worthy items. I wear them almost every day, time and again, and love them as much as I did the day I put my credit card down.

We talk a lot in fashion about "investment dressing," which can sound a bit high-minded to those who might not have the cash to invest in anything. (It can also sound a bit naïve, given that most items will depreciate in value no matter how pristine the condition.) But I do think there's a real value in buying just a few things you truly love and wearing them to death. It makes the elation of shopping feel less fleeting.

As for my Katie Ermilio dress? It still has plenty of life. While I'm definitely going to switch up a bit this year for the five or so weddings I have on my calendar, I guarantee it'll make an appearance at least once or twice.

OUR NEW FAVORITE EVENINGWEAR LINE

Sleek, unexpected and slightly daring are the words we'd use to describe Mary-Kate and Ashley Olsen's trademark style. Fittingly, those same adjectives apply to the pair's first-ever eveningwear collection. Part of their contemporary label Elizabeth and James, the duo's six-piece capsule includes fitted columnar gowns and crop tops that can be mixed and matched with maxi and tulle skirts. The looks are fully black-tie appropriate, but easily transition to more casual affairs. Just think how cute the above crop top would look with high-waisted skinny jeans and d'Orsay flats.

JAPANESE COMICS AND RETRO CUTS PLAY INTO THIS LONDON LABEL'S IDIOSYNCRATIC VIBE.

Since its launch in 2012, A.W.A.K.E.—an acronym for All Wonderful Adventures Kindle Enthusiasm—has garnered an impressive roster of fans, including tastemakers Miroslava Duma, Caroline de Maigret and Caroline Issa. "Anything good and new almost always comes from something old," says the brand's founder, former fashion editor Natalia Alaverdian. This philosophy can easily be seen in the Russian-born, Belgium-raised designer's spring collection, which blends '60s and '70s silhouettes with high-tech graphics—and draws from references as diverse as Japanese manga and Mother Nature. Standouts include metallic emerald minidresses finished with origami belts, double-breasted skinny suits in a dragonfly motif and doodle-print ultra-wide-leg flares. Says Alaverdian, "For me, modern and vintage elements all flow together; one organically grows from the other."

LUXURY MARKET

Datura.com is our new go-to for classic, wear-forever staples.

Datura is a perfect moniker for Stefania Borras' direct-to-consumer label. Named after a flower known for its simple beauty (and hallucinogenic properties), the line features elegant yet bold pieces made from 100 percent natural materials. "I saw a void for timeless, quality clothes at an affordable price," says Borras, who worked for brands like Burberry in her native Spain before moving to New York in 2013. "By choosing a Web-exclusive platform, we were able to take away the middleman. It's luxury for every day," she says. Timelessness also plays into the sales model. "We don't follow a traditional fashion calendar, so everything works year-round," says Borras, who designs in Manhattan and produces there and in Barcelona. "We don't have end-of-season sales—merchandise is restocked once it sells out." Therefore, favorites like boxy mohair sweaters, camel cashmere coats and black crepe silk jumpsuits are never retired. "They're staples you can wear in many ways and for years to come," she says.

Durable, colorful and impeccably sized: We can always count on Prada to create an enduring classic.

When searching for the best pouch to carry your cosmetics, it's easy to feel a bit like Goldilocks—this one is too big, that one can barely hold a tube of mascara ... Luckily, Prada's chic nylon version is just right. Not only is the six-inch size ideal and the design appealingly simple (clean lines, bold solid shades and the brand's recognizable triangular logo), it's also all but impossible to destroy. "Where most makeup bags have a dorm-room cheap-and-cheerfulness that gets old—not to mention tattered and stained—fast, the impossible-to-improve-upon Prada is iconic," says Lucky editor at large Jean Godfrey-June. "Plus, a tube of foundation can explode all over it, literally, and you simply wash it out." —Jayna Maleri

"But beyond the runways, and in the fluorescent-lit beauty closet, we've landed on another philosophy—a little contrast almost always looks best."

There is no exact science. But multiple excellent theories abound, many of which were put to the test at the spring shows, where scarlet reigned.

First, there's the idea of a one-shade-fits-all formula that's not too cool (blue-red) or too warm (orange-red) and looks amazing on all complexions. This is, essentially, the unicorn of red lipstick, which is why makeup artists often concoct their own.

Backstage at Zac Posen, makeup artist Kabuki brilliantly layered a blue-based pencil under an orangey-red pigment, resulting in a beautiful hue that stunned as much on Arlenis Sosa's warm, cinnamon complexion as it did on Coco Rocha's cool, porcelain skin.

This was also the method at Burberry, where makeup artist Wendy Rowe chose a shade that had a little pink, a little blue and a little orange in the mix.

Then we've got the non-committal, dipping-your-toes-in-the-water route (best for novices): Use a sheer version so the color isn't too bold. Or, in the case of Andrew Gn, just partially apply it. Makeup artist Karim Rahman diffused the outer edges of models' lips, blurring any harsh lines, resulting in a more tempered effect.

Another popular opinion among pros is that every variety of red works on everyone. At Carolina Herrera, makeup artist Diane Kendal used five different lipsticks—ranging from coral to blue-red—on models of every skin tone. Unsurprisingly, they all looked fantastic. A little attitude truly goes a long way.

But beyond the runways, and in the fluorescent-lit beauty closet, we've landed on another philosophy—a little contrast almost always looks best. NYC-based celebrity makeup artist Daniel Martin tends to agree. "An orange-based red lipstick brightens up the face of someone with a cool complexion," he says. "And a blue-based lipstick is more dramatic on someone with warm skin." That said, experimentation is half the fun. "You just have to own it and wear it effortlessly."

J.Crew's Secret Lipstick Formula Revealed!

As makeup artist for the J.Crew catalog, Troi Ollivierre has custom-blended the signature bright lipcolors on the models for years. Now he's delivering his secret shades to the world, putting six of his favorites into tubes. The veritable lipstick wardrobe ranges from the ideal red to the perfect poppy pink, and the formula feels creamy yet has a semi-matte, stay-in-place finish. And—like the makeup equivalent of a crisp white button-down—each one looks elegantly cool on everybody.

O'Neill (and her scar) awash in SPF45 in Colombia.

The nurse holds up a large needle. "First this is going to hurt. Then it'll start to burn," she says. The needle goes in, and after the hurt and burn my whole shoulder turns frighteningly numb. The doctor picks up a small scalpel, and I turn away as she cuts out the area of skin around and beneath one of my tiniest freckles—the one I'd always thought was sort of sexy because it's on my shoulder bone and perfectly round. It's premalignant. It has to come out.

I'm black and—like the rest of the human race—I think I look fitter, prettier, more can't-put-your-finger-on-it better with a tan. On an even more primal level, I just love the sun. I live for those humid Manhattan summer days when my skin feels hot to the touch, like scorched concrete. I'm constantly crossing to the bright side of the street because I don't want to miss one second of those searing rays. My dream scenario is simple: me, in a tiny camouflage bikini, splayed on a beach—I'd even take my roof in

SUN SCARE

Lighter than Lupita, considerably darker than Joan Smalls, Lucky senior associate beauty editor Megan O'Neill lived to bask in the heat, until a freckle changed everything.

Brooklyn—steadily blackening as I read a pile of magazines, dripping with sweat and happy. It's with despair that I walk into my office building each day, shivering and woebegone at the initial blast of chilly air. It's either my Jamaican blood or I'm just a total freak, but for me, too much sun is utter heaven.

Or my death warrant, I realize as I sit in Debra Jaliman, M.D.'s office with four post-procedure stitches in my shoulder.

Recent studies from the Journal of the American Academy of Dermatology and American Journal of Preventive Medicine show that of those diagnosed with skin cancer, 14 percent more African Americans die than Caucasians. An enormous 63 percent of African Americans have never even worn sunscreen. Alarmingly, only 17 percent of African Americans and Hispanics have ever gone to a doctor for a skin check.

"I'm black and—like the rest of the human race—I think I look fitter, prettier, more can't-put-your-finger-on-it better with a tan."

I had rolled my eyes when Dr. Jaliman first fixated on my inconspicuous little freckle. I was completely shocked when, after she'd superficially removed it and sent it to the lab, the results came back premalignant, meaning it would have undoubtedly become cancerous and spread. "No one knows what day a premalignant mole will turn malignant—it can take a few months or years," she explains. "You take it out the second you find it."

The deadliest type of skin cancer, melanoma forms when a pigment cell called a melanocyte (a skin cell that produces melanin and manifests itself as a mole or freckle) turns malignant and starts to reproduce out of control. In advanced stages, melanoma can metastasize or spread to your brain, lungs and liver. About 9,940 Americans will die from it this year, and it's the most common form of cancer in people ages 25 to 29. According to the Skin Cancer Foundation, melanoma kills one person every 57 minutes. More people are diagnosed with skin cancer than with breast, colon, prostate and lung cancer combined, according to the American Cancer Society.

The two other skin cancers are not nearly as deadly: basal-cell carcinoma, which usually does not spread and looks like a pink growth or shiny bump, and squamous-cell carcinoma, which appears as a scaly, red patch or a bleeding sore but carries a greater chance of metastasizing. These cancers are about 90 percent linked to sun exposure and diagnosed mainly in fair people, as opposed to melanoma, which also has a genetic component. If a doctor finds a melanoma in its early stages, before it's metastasized, she can potentially save your life by cutting out the whole area of infected cells. Discovered too late, melanoma can kill you within months.

I still can't wrap my head around my own diagnosis: I have plenty of white, sun-worshipping partners in crime; why don't they have premalignant cells? Admittedly, sunscreen isn't part of my quotidian creams/oils/potions beauty regimen, but for a day at the beach or an outdoorsy festival, I will cover myself in SPF45. I never get sunburns and have very few freckles—nothing large enough to even call a mole. The one Dr. Jaliman excised was positively demure—flat, round and black—with none of the obvious signs. Or so I thought.

A mole becomes suspicious when it has an irregular shape, has a diameter larger than 6mm or has drastically evolved. "Being extremely dark, like yours, or a variation in color within the mole are also red flags," says Dr. Jaliman. "One teeny pinpoint of a dot that's a different shade can be a melanoma. I've found it—and I've found it on darker skin."

My abnormal mole indicates the direction in which my skin is going, she explains. As someone with high blood pressure will very likely have a stroke if she isn't careful, I will develop skin cancer if I'm not careful. Her words, as I get up to leave, resound: "Always wear sunscreen. Most important—STAY. OUT. OF. THE. SUN."

brother, who both take pains to eat healthy, exercise and gorge on raw vegetable juice a few times a week (my mom is always foisting new, murky combinations on me that she whips up in her NutriBullet), have always resisted sunscreen and skin checks. A few weeks before I knew about my premalignant mole, I'd broached the subject:

"What do I need a skin check for? I'm black!" my brother disparaged, as if I'd proposed he make an appointment to confirm he still, in fact, had two eyeballs. "You're just obsessed with going to the doctor." (I'm honestly not.)

My Jamaican mom: "I hate the sun. I don't lie out on the beach like all you girls. I'm not going to get anything walking to and from work during the week."

I leave the doctor's office, stepping out into what's—cruelly—the sunniest day in weeks. Banished to the shadows like some scurrying sewer rat, I cross to the shady side of the street.

The next few weeks I furiously coat myself with sunscreen and feel forlorn. I also just don't get it. Caucasians have a greater chance of getting melanoma because they have less pigment in their skin to protect against ultraviolet damage. Why are more black people dying of a disease that's more common in white people?

I call Jeanine Downie, M.D., director of Image Dermatology and a Skin Cancer Foundation chair—and a fellow African-American woman. "Black people don't come in as frequently for skin cancer checks because they still think they can't get it," she says. By the time they do come in, possibly for something else, the cancer is typically advanced. "It's called 'skin cancer,' not 'white skin cancer.' Everyone has skin; everyone can get it."

Doctors also don't always check dark-skinned people as thoroughly, Dr. Downie acknowledges. She emphasizes that everyone should get checked from scalp to toe at least once a year—Bob Marley died of a melanoma on the teensiest spot on his foot, she reminds me—by a board-certified dermatologist, not your GP, not your ob-gyn. Ethnic people, along with everyone else, should wear SPF30 or above every single day, even if it's cloudy. "You might not see or feel the sun, but believe me, it's there," Dr. Downie warns.

Physical sunscreens (containing minerals like zinc and titanium dioxide) deflect ultraviolet rays; chemical ones work by absorbing them. Both help prevent sunburns, and according to the Skin Cancer Foundation, both help prevent melanoma and other skin cancers. Because mineral formulas don't rub in as well and show up pasty even on pale people, on my skin, it's like trying to make Greek yogurt disappear into a chalkboard. I've already resigned myself to streaky sunscreen hell when Dr. Downie throws me a life-changing tidbit.

"Combined chemical and mineral SPFs—look for ones containing chemical UVA/UVB absorbers and zinc or titanium dioxide—are what every African American needs," she enthuses. "They melt into your skin gorgeously."

This great news encourages me to ask her if I really do need to avoid luxuriating in the sun forevermore.

"Just be smart. Be careful. Check yourself," she tells me. "The sun is like anything; it's beautiful in moderation."

The next morning is unseasonably warm, and within 15 minutes of getting up, I'm outside, smoothed down in SPF30, wearing my sickest Public School leather baseball cap for protection. I stop to take it off, tilting my face skyward, smiling at how warm and consoling and enlivening these brilliant rays feel. I still keep to the shady side of the street—but I don't return home until darkness swallows every streak of lingering, Technicolor daylight.

THE BEAUTY CLOSET

Editor JEAN GODFREY-JUNE sure can't tell the future, but she knows to strike while these matches are hot.

Fresh Zodiac Oval Soap in Leo, $15, fresh.com

"You can't predict the future, can you?" This was a favorite refrain of the Zen Therapist (he treated monks along with the regulars; knowing that was his nickname would have horrified him). "Can you get comfortable sitting on the edge of the unknown?" he'd ask. It isn't comfortable on the edge of the unknown. I want to know.

Astrologers, psychics and the like do predict the future, hence their deep appeal. But even very good ones, I feel, are better with insights about the present and the past—about a person's nature, how they relate to others. More like a therapist. A talented and insightful therapist. The future? I can't say yes, and I can't say no; I sit on the edge of the unknown. This spectacular-looking, beautifully citrusy soap speaks to the make-it-happen Leo in me; I wash my hands or use it in the shower and I feel both indulged and ready to conquer the world. There is a soap for every sign in the zodiac, and I cannot think of a gift more universally pleasing.

The world is crazy for masks all of a sudden. Blame it on South Korea, blame it on the overly intense winter of 2015, but take your crazed-ness and pick an option that produces actual, visible results—such as this all-natural, vitamin-C-packed, instant-glow-inducing miracle. It takes one minute and leaves your skin baby-smooth and luminescent. Ideal before a party, a date or one of those makeup-less weekends when you need to look as hot as possible.

Ren Flash Rinse 1 Minute Facial, $48, luckyshops.com

Strike one of these endlessly long matches (so you never burn your fingers and you feel like a '20s heiress dangling her cigarette from its super-attenuated holder) and the scent that momentarily fills the air is probably appreciable only to you. But add a fleeting, secret bit of fragrance (Bartolomé, left, mixes nutmeg and licorice) to what have to be the most gorgeous, glamorous matchboxes ever and a practical object becomes that thrilling, chic indulgence. In theory you could do without them, but you will really, really love them.

THE BEAUTY ISSUE

Who better to front our annual beauty issue than Joan Smalls? Not only lovely on the outside, the supermodel is also smart and playful and has a killer fashion sense. "It was such a fun day of shooting," says JOAN'S WORLD stylist Samantha Traina. "I wanted the looks to feel authentic to Joan's own personal off-duty style, which has an edgy, feminine elegance to it." Model and actress Olga Kurylenko, who shows off bright, timeless pieces in SPRING FLING, is also the complete package. "She's a natural in front of the camera, spontaneous and energetic," says stylist Sophie Pera. "For the story, I mixed pops of color with all-American classics." On the other end of the rainbow is WHITE NOISE, which showcases the season's neutral standouts. "This spring the collections are full of all kinds of new white silhouettes, like relaxed trenches, kimono tops and eveningwear," says stylist Heidi Bivens. There's something for everyone—and that's a beautiful thing.

JOAN'S WORLD

The era of the supermodel is back—and Joan Smalls has a whole lot to do with it. The 26-year-old beauty talks to Jenna Gottlieb about small-town casting calls, Beyoncé and dreaming really big.

PHOTOGRAPHED BY MIGUEL REVERIEGO
FASHION BY SAMANTHA TRAINA

If there's one thing Joan Smalls can't stand, it's a helpless heroine. "I hate a damsel in distress. I saw the movie Brave and was like, 'Yep, that's right!' " she says, referring to Merida, Disney's wild-haired, bow-and-arrow-wielding, kingdom-saving princess. "I like an empowered girl who can kick some ass."

It makes sense. Smalls herself is a force to be reckoned with. One of the world's top models, she's the face of Estée Lauder, a muse to Givenchy artistic director Riccardo Tisci, a Victoria's Secret mainstay and a former MTV House of Style host. She's appeared in campaigns for designers including Stella McCartney,

"IT'S THE BEST WHEN YOU'RE WEARING SOMETHING INEXPENSIVE AND SOMEONE GOES, 'OH MY GOD, WHO MADE THAT?' "

Sweatshirt, $108, briefs, $58, Joan Smalls x True Religion, truereligion.com. Jeans, $98, Levi's, levi.com

Fendi, Chanel, Marc Jacobs and Cavalli—and on the runways of countless others. You can credit her—along with close pals Karlie Kloss, Cara Delevingne and Gigi Hadid—for the second coming of the supermodel, capital S.

Smalls was born the youngest of three sisters in Hatillo, Puerto Rico, to a social worker mother and accountant father. The family home, where her parents still live, is situated on six acres of rural land overlooking the lush Cordillera Central mountain range. "It's country," she says. "Everything surrounding you is green. It's pure bliss." Currently, the model is sitting in a decidedly unpastoral setting: the dimly lit Standard Grill restaurant in Manhattan's Meatpacking District. She has just wrapped eight hours of shooting on location in the West Village for this story and is enjoying a side of fries dipped in ketchup with a touch of mayonnaise. She's admittedly tired, but her wide, catlike eyes light up when recounting her childhood: the hours spent playing outside ("scars from all the scraped knees are my badges of honor"), tending to her family's array of animals ("cows, goats, chickens, peacocks, turkeys, two dogs—everything except horses") and snacking on the fruit and vegetables that grew on the property.

"Today everyone is all about organic this, organic that—but that's just how I grew up, eating from our plantain, banana and orange trees," says Smalls. "It's funny, I never even liked avocados until recently. And we had them in my backyard, so now they're almost like a comfort food. I had it so good when I was a little kid and I didn't even know it!"

Life on the farm gave her a love of the great outdoors, but it was television that introduced the lanky tomboy to the world of high fashion. She traces her career aspirations back to the series E! True Hollywood Story, which showcased catwalkers Naomi Campbell, Kate Moss and Christie Brinkley. "I'd just watch the show and be glued to the screen," says Smalls. "I couldn't even imagine—these were women who got to travel the world. It just seemed so alluring." She also recognized a bit of herself in their images. "I was so awkward-looking—tall, super skinny, gangly. The boys at school made fun of me," she says. "But I'd see those girls on TV and I'd think, Oh, they have my same body type."

At 13, she began signing up for modeling competitions, which involved traveling—sometimes for hours—to compete at shopping malls. "I lost every single time. We had a gray minivan, and one time it broke down during a long drive home, and I remember thinking, Is this even worth it? But I loved it. And I had my family's blessing, which was cool. My parents were into it. They were like, 'Why not? It's a fun extracurricular activity, and she has good grades.' Their support was crucial, because I didn't have a license to get myself places."

Education was always priority number one in her household. Before Smalls made an attempt at a full-blown career, her parents had one condition—that she get a college degree. She did so in just two years, barreling through an intensive program in psychology at a university in San Juan, and graduating magna cum laude to boot.

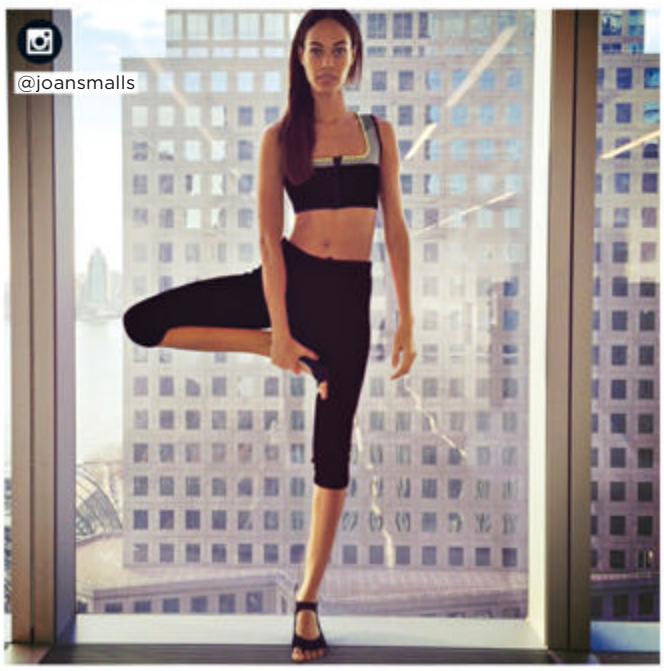

Diploma in hand and undeterred by her previous modeling track record, she took a trip to New York and met with a number of agencies. One of them, Elite, promised a contract contingent on her East Coast relocation. Smalls returned home, packed her bags and moved into her aunt's apartment in Queens, where she slept on an air mattress in her cousin's bedroom. That summer, she turned 19.

"New York was quite a shock, but I was so eager and hungry," she says. "I'd take the bus to get on the subway to make it to castings." And then came the rejections—hundreds of them. "You're competing with 40, 100, 200 other girls. You go to a call, see the casting list and you're number 202. And you know there are just a couple of open spots."

There were days when she'd attend as many as 15 calls. "I would say to myself, I just want to get to a place in my career where I don't have to do castings, because it was grueling. There are so many places to be at once, you're always running late and then having to wait your turn. Now I'll sometimes see models rushing around the city, and I totally feel what they're going through."

Perseverance paid off, and within the year she had booked gigs with brands including Tory Burch, Neiman Marcus and Liz Claiborne. Then, finally, came a turning point. "I shot with Coco Rocha for Liz Claiborne and was like, wait, I'm in a picture with her? She's huge! Maybe I can really do this."

The work remained steady, albeit mainly commercial, until high fashion came calling. In 2010, Givenchy's Riccardo Tisci handpicked Smalls to star in the French house's spring haute couture show. "I had been shooting a lot of catalogs up until then. Riccardo bleached my eyebrows and I suddenly became this androgynous, versatile model. It kick-started my career for sure," she says.

The big names—all of them—followed suit. Over the next few years, there were campaigns with Karl, Miuccia and Prabal, a top-10 spot on Forbes magazine's "World's Highest-Paid Models" list in 2013 and editorial features with every major fashion publication on earth.

But her loyalty to Tisci remains evident, especially in her wardrobe. Today the 5'10" stunner is wearing a graphic "Jesus is Lord" Givenchy tee ("an oldie but a goodie") paired with Zara jeans, an oversize shearling Acne jacket and a bag by, of course, Givenchy. "I love to mix high and low—it's the best when you have on something inexpensive and someone goes, 'Oh my God, who made that?' " she says. Recently, she attended a fitting in a Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles printed dress. "Everyone was like, 'Is that Jeremy Scott?' I was like, 'Um, I just bought it at this quirky mall store because I loved the cartoon when I was little.' "

That's the best part about Smalls' style—we never know what to expect. One minute she's the epitome of off-duty cool in shredded cutoffs and Isabel Marant high-tops, and the next she's at the Met Gala with Vera Wang, wearing a shimmery tawny gown and matte violet lipstick. Her playfulness and daring have made her a favorite among not only designers but street style photographers as well.

"There are no rules. I know what I like and what I don't, what looks good on me and what doesn't," she says. When pressed to name something in that latter category, she definitively answers: "Patterns! You know when someone wears a printed skirt with a printed top? For whatever reason, I can't do that. Sometimes on set they'll have me in a cool graphic outfit and I'll want to replicate it, but I can never get it to look right."

In terms of what she does wear, comfort comes first. Especially when she's lounging around the Williamsburg home she shares with her longtime boyfriend, entrepreneur Bernard Smith. "I like to hang out in sweats and a bun and be all messy," she says. "My days off are so chill. I cook, clean, watch Netflix. Lately I've been very into Beyond Scared Straight," she says of the A&E reality show that attempts to reform troubled teens with tough love. "Just try one episode—it's addictive. And I like that there's always a positive message." She also works out, often. In addition to sessions with a personal trainer and regular solo visits to the gym, the fitness enthusiast has recently taken up studying Muay Thai boxing, a Southeast Asian combat sport. "I did kickboxing in college, and I wanted to learn another discipline, another martial art. I really like to have a practice—none of that 'Oh, I'm boxing for cardio' stuff."

There's also her lifelong love of dancing, some of which she showcased in Beyoncé's 2013 "Yoncé" video. Says Smalls of Queen B, "She was just like, 'Be you!' It was funny because she had to stand there and chill while we were dancing and doing our thing. She kept saying, 'This is so weird. I'm not doing anything!' We had some laughs." Last month, Smalls again showed off her moves for her latest project, a collaboration with True Religion that offers everything from cropped sweatshirts to boyfriend briefs—and includes a promotional video of Smalls breaking it down Jennifer Beals–style in a pair of the aforementioned hot pants. "Aren't they cute?! You can wear them out or sleep in them, whatever you want," she says. The clip is enough to make anyone sign up at the local Equinox. "I come from a Latin culture; rhythm is in my roots," she says. It's also her therapy. "If I have an early shoot and I've just gotten off a plane, or I haven't slept, or I feel gross, I'll dance around and be silly," she says. "I put on Drake or Nicki Minaj or Cultura Profética, a Puerto Rican band. It gets me pumped up."

Model, designer, dancer—I ask what she thinks of her emerging status as a powerhouse hyphenate. "I feel like a good amount of women have used modeling as a platform. People like Gisele and Cindy. And I think that's really cool, not only for models but for women. It shows that you can have a voice and a say. You can have a brand and be your own boss. It's empowering."

Meet Olga

Olga Kurylenko has made a career out of channeling her inner tough girl. "I think I subconsciously avoid glamorous roles," says the model turned actress, who stars this month as Turkish war widow Ayshe in The Water Diviner, Russell Crowe's directorial debut. "I never wanted to be typecast, so I really resisted those parts, especially in the beginning." After leaving her native Ukraine for Paris at age 16 to pursue modeling, Kurylenko graced the cover of French Elle and appeared in campaigns for Kenzo before switching to acting. Her big Hollywood break came with 2008's Quantum of Solace, where she was cast as Bolivian agent Camille Montes opposite Daniel Craig's 007—and, impressively, performed most of her own stunts. She's been playing feisty females ever since. "I like when there's hard work involved," says Kurylenko. "My role in The Water Diviner wasn't easy—but who wants easy?" She's equally daring when it comes to her personal style. "My closet is full of bright flashy yellows, reds, greens, oranges—really everything except for powder blue," she says. "I feel like you need to have blond hair to pull that off." —Jenna Gottlieb

Fashion Addict
BY HILARY RHODA

I'm addicted to statement necklaces!

"I gravitate toward simple, comfortable and classic clothes, so throwing on a cool necklace is an easy way for me to dress up an outfit and make it feel interesting. I bought my first piece from Dannijo four years ago. Now I have about 20 in my collection and I wear them three or four times a week. I love to pair a crystal necklace with a chambray button-down—the unexpected mix is so fun. The more of a statement the piece is, the better. I just rock it out and let it shine."
